The course covers a range of theoretical, practical, and ethical issues in linguistics research. On the one hand it examines principles for undertaking empirical research, introduces popular quantitative and qualitative methods for conducting small-scale research in the language classroom and provides hands-on experience with research design, instruments for data collection, quantitative and qualitative methods of data analysis, evaluation of published research, and research report writing. On the other hand it deals with the legal and ethical aspects of research, clarifies the notion of intellectual property and plagiarism and helps students in avoiding plagiarism. The ultimate scope of the course is to have students prepare the research proposal for their thesis. The main objectives: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - The course outlines the basic notions of the research organisation, methodology and intellectual property; - Research principles, types of research, research paradigms, designs, methods and instruments; - Structure of the research process, basic research models and steps; - Principles of qualitative and quantitative research methods, data collection and analysis; - Literature analysis and writing a publication; - Organisation of a report;

- Avoiding plagiarism and other unethical behaviour in research

Learning outcomes:

- A heightened awareness of practical and ethical issues in doing second language research
- An understanding of major research perspectives, important principles for research design, and commonly used research methodologies.
- The ability to select an appropriate research topic, to formulate researchable questions, and to write a research proposal.
- The ability to identify appropriate areas of literature for a specific language teaching/learning research topic.
- The ability to design an effective structure for a literature review and to write it using proper citation techniques.
- The ability to access and extract relevant information from secondary data sources.
- The ability to avoid plagiarism
- A working knowledge of intellectual property.
- Skills for collecting, compiling and analysing different types of research data in an ethically correct way.
- The ability to write research proposals, papers and reports in APA style.
- The ability to constructively criticize the methods of quantitative and qualitative research methods used in published studies
